

Dual Degree Programs

Washington University School of Law offers several dual-degree options in collaboration with the university's other highly respected graduate schools. The School of Law and the participating departments work together so that a student can earn a Juris Doctor (JD) and a master's or doctoral degree in another discipline in considerably less time than they would need to pursue each degree separately.

Applicants must gain admission to each program independently and therefore might need to take separate entrance exams (e.g., the Graduate Record Examination or the Graduate Management Admission Test) in addition to the Law School Admission Test.

The School of Law accepts up to 9 units earned in the other divisions toward the JD degree, as long as the JD is finished at the same time or immediately after the master's degree. The other divisions accept varying amounts of credit earned in the law school toward the master's degree.

- JD/LLM in Intellectual Property and Technology Law Program

In addition, students can design a dual degree to meet their individual interests by combining law with another master's program at the university.
